

Robert Kilroy-Silk writes...on Iraq - Worse Than Before the War?

Note: This article was first published in the Sunday Express on 3 October 2004

Tony Blair constantly insists that the world is a better place without Saddam. is it? Well, the British and American intelligence services argued before the war that an invasion would destabilise Iraq and cause anarchy and increase international terrorism. They have been proved right.

Again, the families of thousands of Iraqis killed by the war and since - by the terrorists and the coalition forces - don't think the world's a better place either.

And the wives, the children, the mothers and the families of the 70 British servicemen and the thousand and more Americans certainly don't think that the world is a better place.

So who does, Tony, besides yourself? Let's be brutally honest about it; do those who agree with you outnumber those who do not?

No need to tell us, we know the answer, and you're deluding yourself again.
